Developing learners' ORACY skills through three types of talk seminar organised in collaboration with

Macmillan Education and Mondadori Education

Abstract:

The concept of oracy was first developed in the 1960s to bring together speaking and listening skills. There have been several different proposed frameworks for teaching oracy skills since then. In this session, we shall explore how teachers can use the one by the National Literacy Trust UK in general English and exam preparation classes. By sharing ideas for planning and teaching various speaking activities, I aim to demonstrate how teachers can readily incorporate three types of talk in developing learners' oracy skills.

In the workshop, we shall try several hands-on speaking activities to illustrate the three types of talk for oracy. There will also be opportunities for teachers to collaboratively design their own assessment criteria and evaluation form for spoken presentations, which they can subsequently use as templates in their lessons.

Abstract:

Shakespeare's two Venetian plays are notable, among other things, for being centred on a problem of racial discrimination. This was not the main reading of the plays until well into the nineteenth century but has become increasingly so in modern times. Shakespeare's dealing with a racial problem clearly emerges from the text, as well as from the Venetian context of the stories. An interesting angle on the racial problem is also that until World War II the role of Othello was generally denied to black actors in Britain and especially in the USA, being subsequently associated with the struggle against racist oppression.
